 MY REVIEWERS

Students struggle with feedback

Students find instructors' grades and comments to be confusing, contradictory, and unfair

Students lose track of critical feedback on past writing

Students are unsure of how to give or receive critical feedback

Instructors struggle with grading

Faculty find grading to be too time-consuming and ineffective

Faculty distrust peer review. They need tools and resources to guide students' peer reviews

Final bibliography Draft Stop and frisk is a major policy practiced by police that has a handful of history behind it. This policy allows police to check, question, and search any citizen viewed as "suspicious". The first case of this was in 1960 after the earliest (but unofficial) case of stop and frisk resulted in the Terry V Ohio supreme court case which led to the practice being ruled Constitutional. Despite this the use of stop and frisk was low until the 1990's when the crime rate in New York greatly increased. Due to the increased use and various factors the stop and frisk policy has become a contested debate topic. For instance one factor being that crime rate did go down by the 2000's after stop and frisk was used more often. Another factor being that the amount of friskees found which weapons/suspicious items was low compared to the total amount of people checked. Looking at these factors along with some other factors how has stop and frisk affected New York's crime rate?

Belin, Jeffery. "The Inverse Relationship Between Constitutionality and Effectiveness of New York city's "Stop and frisk". Boston University Law Review, Vol 94, pg 1495-1520, 2014, Accessed 19 February 2017. Social Science Research Network This journal article highlights factors on why stop and frisk increased in use during the 1990s. The main factor being New York's record high crime rates mostly composed of homicides. As a result the NYPD adopted a "broken window policy" or policy focused on stricter policing for major and minor crimes while conducting stop and frisk. Due to this the crime rate was able to go down by the 2000s. However only a small amount of friskees were found with weapons or dangerous objects. This article was written by Jeffery Bellin a Stanford law school graduate and a current law professor at William and Mary law school. This Article links my research question by showing why the stop and frisk method increased in the 1990s and some of the effects of the increase.

Gelman Andrew, Fagan Jeffery, Kiss Alex. "An Analysis of the Police Department's "Stop and Frisk" Policy in Context of Racial Bias." Journal of American Statistical Legislation, Vol 102, September 2007, pg 813-823. Accessed February 19th 2017. American Statistical association.

This Source offered information mostly on why the police force was using stop and frisk. For instance they needed to try something to try tone down the 90's crime surge. However it did show that despite that it was met with little approval from citizens and was contested frequently. In 1996 the Debour V People case green lighted the officer's decision to check a person simply cause they had 'stuffed pockets'. However the Brown V Texas case the ruling was the police could not use the reason that "the person walk away from them" and a
